

The telecommunications infrastructure in the United States was developed by entrepreneurial companies working with franchise from local, state, and federal government.

Since those facilities were developed in collaboration, decisions on their use must be developed in collaboration. State and federal commissions must have the right to determine, after appropriate debate, which products and services should be open to competition over those facilities. This is the only way quality service and competitive pricing can be encouraged.